

PUBLIC SEMINAR

IHL COMMITTEE, AUSTRALIAN RED CROSS ACT supported by the ANU CENTRE FOR KNOWLEDGE & DEVELOPMENT, REGNET
NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF SOCIAL SCIENCES & LAW, ANU and AUSTRALIAN & NEW ZEALAND INSTITUTE OF HEALTH, LAW & ETHICS
present a Solferino Seminar

International Humanitarian Law & Access to Essential Medicines

Dr Thomas Faunce

Senior Lecturer, ANU Medical School; Lecturer, ANU Law Faculty; Project Director, Globalisation & Health, Centre for Governance and Development, RegNet, The Australian National University

Wednesday 20 July 2005, 5.30 – 7.00pm (followed by refreshments)

Innovations Lecture Theatre

Innovations Building (#124), cnr Garran & Eggleston Rds, The Australian National University

Enquiries to: landerson@redcross.org.au or (02) 6206 6037

This seminar will explore the question of whether the corpus of International Humanitarian Law (IHL), enshrined primarily in the 1949 Geneva Conventions and their 1977 Additional Protocols, places obligations upon States to accord or not obstruct access by prisoners, wounded combatants and civilian populations in situations of armed conflict, to affordable, essential medicines. The question is important given that large areas of the globe are effectively war zones and that obstructing access to such medicines offers a tactic for pressuring individuals or populations in such contexts.

Solferino Seminars are organised by the International Humanitarian Law Department of the Australian Red Cross in the ACT. The name Solferino comes from the battlefield in Northern Italy where, in 1859, Henry Dunant witnessed great carnage and suffering, inspiring him to work for the establishment of the Red Cross Movement.

The views expressed in this lecture are those of the presenter and do not necessarily represent the views of The Australian National University